

THE HONORABLE RICHARD A. JONES

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT
WESTERN DISTRICT OF WASHINGTON
AT SEATTLE

ABDIQAFAR WAGAFE, et al., on behalf of themselves and others similarly situated,

Plaintiffs,

v.

DONALD TRUMP, President of the United States, et al.,

Defendants.

No. 2:17-cv-00094-RAJ

PLAINTIFFS' REPLY IN SUPPORT OF MOTION FOR COURT PERMISSION
TO INTERVIEW LIMITED NUMBER OF PERSONS WHO SUSPECT THEY HAVE BEEN SUBJECTED TO CARRP

NOTE ON MOTION CALENDAR: January
24, 2020

I. INTRODUCTION

Defendants’ opposition provides no concrete reason to justify prohibiting Plaintiffs from conducting limited-scope interviews with six individuals who already believe that they have been subject to CARRP. Instead, Defendants rely on vague allusions to national security, and further claim—contrary to the Court’s prior rulings—that evidence related to potential unnamed class members are irrelevant to the development of Plaintiffs’ case. These unsupported assertions ignore the realities of this litigation and resurrect arguments that the Court has previously dismissed as unpersuasive. This evidence poses a minimal risk to Defendants’ purported security interests and goes directly to the core of Plaintiffs’ case.

Defendants’ purported national security concerns are unsupported by any specific facts and remain entirely speculative. Further, Defendants’ misstate the issue by arguing that Plaintiffs’ proposed contact with the six individuals who responded to the notice would cause those individuals to “surmise” that their applications were subject to CARRP. Opp. at 1, 6. On the contrary, these individuals responded to the notice precisely because they already suspect that they are subject to CARRP and had concluded as a result that they might have information relevant to this litigation. Defendants’ claim that potential class members contacted by Plaintiffs’ counsel would alter their behavior or impede ongoing law enforcement investigations is specious because these individuals already believe their immigration benefits applications are subject to CARRP. Further, Defendants’ contention that terrorists may have responded to the class notice for the purpose of testing whether the Government is pursuing them is wildly speculative at best. Defendants cannot use such conjecture—untethered to logic or evidence—to justify curtailing Plaintiffs’ right to develop relevant evidence.

Defendants also err in contending that evidence from potential class members is irrelevant, a contention at odds with the Court’s prior recognition that such information is relevant to Plaintiffs’ prosecution of their claims. Dkt. Nos. 183 at 3, 274 at 6. Plaintiffs seek to vindicate the rights and present the experiences of unnamed class members, who are directly

1 impacted by this litigation. This information is certainly germane to this case. Defendants’
 2 assertion that the class should be decertified if Plaintiffs seek to develop and present evidence of
 3 individuals’ harms as a result of CARRP misunderstands the nature of class action suits and
 4 ignores parties’ rights to marshal and present evidence in support of their narratives. Limited
 5 contact that would not confirm to potential class members whether their applications were 6 subject to CARRP would allow counsel to identify relevant evidence, as well as fairly and 7 adequately represent the interests of the two certified classes.

8 The Court should grant Plaintiffs’ motion to interview persons who responded to 9 Plaintiffs’ Class Notice.

10 II. ARGUMENT

11 A. Defendants’ purported security concerns are specious, conclusory, and 12 unsupported.

13 Defendants assert that Plaintiffs’ proposed contact with potential unnamed class members
 14 would confirm the individuals’ CARRP status and enable them to alter their behavior to evade
 15 government scrutiny. This is baseless speculation and is unsupported by any concrete
 16 information. In a prior ruling, the Court noted that Defendants offered only a “vague, brief
 17 explanation” of these same concerns, grounded in “mere speculation” and positing only a
 18 “hypothetical result.” Dkt. 98 at 3. As this Court has previously emphasized, the government 19 “may not merely say those magic words—‘national security threat’—and automatically have its 20 requests granted in this forum.” Dkt. 202 at 3. Yet Defendants insist on repeating these 21 arguments without offering any factual support for their assertions that individuals who already
 22 suspect their immigration benefits applications are subject to CARRP would alter their behavior
 23 or somehow impede law enforcement investigations if contacted by Plaintiffs’ counsel.

24 Vague allusions to hypothetical security risks are not sufficient to justify a prohibition on 25 contact between Plaintiffs’ counsel and potential class members, particularly where contact
 26 would be limited to a pre-determined set of questions that adhere to the Court’s protective order.

1 Defendants’ alarmist hypothetical scenario—which envisions that individuals who responded to
2 the class notice did so “for entirely nefarious reasons,” Opp. at 7—pure speculation and divorced
3 from any facts or reason. This argument does not constitute a “specific record” showing “the 4 particular abuses” threatened by the proposed contact, as would be required to justify limiting
5 speech between Plaintiffs’ counsel and the potential unnamed class members whose interests
6 they have a duty to investigate and represent. Gulf Oil Co. v. Bernard, 452 U.S. 89, 102 (1981).
7 Rather than any specific factual showing, Defendants offer only conjecture.

8 Further, it is illogical for Defendants to claim that the proposed contact would serve as a
9 catalyst for the individuals in question to begin thwarting law enforcement investigations. As 10 Plaintiffs have explained, the people who responded to the class notice did so precisely because 11 they already believe that they are subject to CARRP. It is unreasonable to suggest that contact
12 with these individuals, who have independently and affirmatively reached out to Plaintiffs’
13 counsel, would be a trigger that causes them or “their associates” to suddenly “alter their 14 behavior” for the purpose of eluding the Government or destroying evidence. See Opp. at 7. For 15 one, Defendants do not explain why someone would respond to the class notice for the purpose
16 of eluding investigation when doing so means drawing attention and scrutiny beyond what the 17 process of applying for immigration benefits already entails. For another, there is nothing
18 concrete to suggest that an individual who believes her application to be subject to CARRP
19 would, as Defendants claim, “nefarious[ly]” seek contact with Plaintiffs’ counsel in order to 20 implement a plan to “go into hiding,” compromise evidence, or “alert” a body of “co-
21 conspirators.” Opp. at 5. This reasoning is illogical and purely hypothetical.

22 Finally, Defendants claim that the usual principles underlying contact between class
23 counsel and potential unnamed class members do not apply here, simply because there are 24 national security risks. This is yet another instance of Defendants invoking the “magic words”
25 without offering evidence to support their position. Dkt. 202 at 3. Notably, the only case that 26 Defendants cite as authority for their proposition that national security displaces the standard relationship between class counsel and class members is completely irrelevant in this context. See Opp. at 78 (citing Berlin Democratic Club v. Rumsfeld, 410 F. Supp. 144, 163 (D.D.C. 1976)). Berlin Democratic Club considered whether to certify a class. Id. But here, the Court has already certified two classes. See Dkt. 69. This is not a question of whether class certification is appropriate—it is a question of whether class counsel may effectively develop its evidence in order to adequately represent the class. There is nothing to support Defendants’ contention that class counsel’s traditional relationship with unnamed class members is fundamentally altered in cases that implicate questions of national security.

To justify limiting Plaintiffs’ contact with potential class members, Defendants must make a showing based on a “specific record” detailing the “particular abuses” that would occur as a result. Gulf Oil, 452 U.S. at 102. Defendants have not met that burden. Allusions to vague national security risks are simply insufficient.

B. Plaintiffs have a compelling need for relevant evidence from potential unnamed class members, and such evidence poses little risk to Defendants’ purported security concerns.

Defendants rely on previously refuted logic to assert that Plaintiffs have no need to gather evidence from potential unnamed class members. The core of Defendants’ position is that the individual experiences of unnamed class members cannot be relevant in a class action, because relief is sought on behalf of the class as a whole. This argument simply ignores the Court’s prior rulings, which have recognized that Plaintiffs should be permitted to “obtain information about particular unnamed class members to develop evidence for use in their case.” Dkt. 183 at 3.

Further, it stands to reason that evidence gathered from potential unnamed class members—whose interests and potential claims may be impacted by the outcome of this litigation—is germane to the prosecution of this case and the effective representation of the class as a whole. In order to present their case with evidentiary richness, Plaintiffs’ counsel must be permitted to investigate facts known to those who make up the class, and whose lives are directly impacted by the CARRP policy. Their stories go directly to the core of Plaintiff’s case,

1 providing evidence, inter alia, as to how CARRP modifies the statutory and regulatory process
2 for adjudicating their applications.

3 Defendants also claim that the information they have provided about CARRP renders
4 superfluous any additional facts that might be gathered from potential class members. But this
5 misunderstands Plaintiffs' goal in developing such evidence. The individual texture and nature
6 of potential unnamed class members' experiences, and the basis of their independent perceptions
7 that they have been subject to CARRP, cannot be found elsewhere. Prohibiting contact with 8 these individuals would make it "more difficult for [Plaintiffs], as the class representatives, to 9 obtain information about the merits of the case from the persons they [seek] to represent." Gulf
10 Oil, 452 U.S. at 101 (emphasis added). Ultimately, Plaintiffs represent classes of people, and 11 class counsel must have the opportunity to speak with the six individuals whose interests are 12 among those Plaintiffs seek to vindicate and protect.

13 III. CONCLUSION

14 Defendants' arguments are speculative and do not justify limiting Plaintiffs' right to 15 gather relevant evidence by conducting very limited-scope interviews with six potential class
16 members. The Court should grant Plaintiffs' motion and permit contact with potential class 17 members.
